

Open Access INR Test

This leaflet explains more about open access INR tests. If you have any further questions, please speak to a doctor or nurse caring for you.

What is an open access INR test?

You can have an INR blood test for warfarin control at a date and time to suit you within a certain week. This will mean that you no longer need to regularly attend the anticoagulation clinic at St George's Hospital, although we will continue to be responsible for dosing your warfarin.

Who can have open access INR test?

You must:

- have a telephone number and be able to understand instructions given over the telephone
- be able to read English
- have a permanent address.

What happens with the open access INR blood test?

A blood sample will be taken from a vein in your arm.

The blood sample or test result is sent with your yellow book to St George's Hospital so dosing can be done by anticoagulation nurses. If you need to make significant dose changes we will telephone you that day.

You will not have to wait after your blood is taken for your yellow book to be returned. The book will usually be posted back the same day by first class post. You should check the dosing in your yellow book when you receive it in case your dose has been changed. Your yellow book will be posted back to you with your next appointment date for your next blood test. You can come to an open access INR blood test any day that week, Monday to Friday (times vary and are given below).

Please note:

If your INR result is low or high you may be asked to come in to clinic.

You should keep an old yellow book and a copy of your most recent results and dosing with you while your current yellow book is being processed in case of emergency.

Where and when can I go for my INR blood test?

Monday to Friday, 8.30am to 12 noon.

Your own GP may also offer blood testing by appointment.

What do I do if I need to see a doctor or nurse?

You may be asked to attend the anticoagulation clinic to see a doctor or nurse if:

- you have recently been an inpatient
- you are due to have surgery or another hospital procedure that means your anticoagulation needs to be adjusted
- you have bleeding or bruising
- you need to be reviewed by the doctor or nurse
- your anticoagulant control is unstable.

If this happens, contact the anticoagulant clinic using the details below and ask for an appointment at the clinic.

What do I need to tell the clinic about?

Please let the clinic know immediately if you:

- change your address or telephone number
- change your medications including herbal or alternative medications
- have any bleeding or bruising
- cannot attend your appointment
- are about to have any surgical, dental or other invasive procedure.
