Donating a kidney if you live overseas

Donation of a kidney from a healthy individual is common practice in the United Kingdom. This information is for patients who are considering donating a kidney in the UK but who live overseas.

Some preliminary tests may be performed overseas but most tests will need to be performed or repeated in the UK. The tests that are required can be complex and unexpected medical conditions are sometimes discovered. If this happens, treatment for these will not be provided by the UK National Health Service (NHS) and you will have to return to your own country for treatment.

Similarly, any surgical or medical complications that occur after you have returned to your country of origin must be treated locally. The NHS will not provide or fund further treatment.

Requirements

The medical and surgical teams need to be satisfied that the potential donor fulfils the UK legal requirements. These are:

1. No reward has been, nor will any be given for the kidney donation.
2. The donor fully understands the proposed operation and consents to the removal of a kidney for transplantation.
3. An independent assessor has conducted separate interviews with the donor and the recipient and has submitted a satisfactory report to the Human Tissue Authority.

If there are any medical or legal concerns, the transplant teams will not agree to perform the transplant and the team will inform the UK Border Agency that the donation will not happen. This may affect the donor's visa and the duration for which his / her visa is valid.

Any questions?

If you have any questions, please contact the living donor coordinators at the intended recipient's local hospital:
